Jim Gilreath discovered his love of photography as a child when he became fascinated with the black and white portraits his grandfather had made using a 4x5 view camera; developed and printed in the darkroom.

When his grandmother gave him his first camera at the age of 10, he began to photograph people, places, and things around him. An aerial photography course in college was another contributing influence. Six hours of laboratory experience per week seeing the Earth's surface through mapping cameras made him realize that the world of photography was very much larger than he had realized.

While serving in the U.S. Army, Jim worked in a professional darkroom and developed the techniques and skills of post-processing. He has taken college photography courses, studied with photography instructors in the classroom and field and has also taught photography courses of his own, including summer enhancement photography courses to elementary school students. He has shared his knowledge of photography with many young people as high school yearbook sponsor. In the years during the transition from film to digital, Jim taught numerous post-processing classes such as Adobe Photoshop and Lightroom. He served as a school system technology coordinator and introduced the early digital cameras to teachers and students.

Jim's work has received numerous awards and his framed work hangs in many homes around the country. Jim has been a member of the Digital Imaging Photography Guild and he is past president of the Middle Georgia Camera Club and a member of Georgia Nature Photographer's Association.

Jim Gilreath is a retired teacher who lives with his wife Sandy, an award-winning master quilter, just north of Macon, Georgia.

Ty Ivey is a retired dentist in Macon and for over 45 years he has been interested in photography since he bought his first SLR Canon while serving in the Navy in Okinawa. He twice won best color print in show at the Georgia State Fair in the 80's but took a vacation from photography while volunteering for his professional association.

In the late 90's, he began to explore nature photography with a prime interest in birds. In 2005, the Georgia Department of Natural Resources published The Breeding Bird Atlas of Georgia and of the 180 species included, 56 of the images were taken by Ty. He has other images used in The Georgia Department of Natural Resources publications. In 2014, his image of a Great Egret in breeding display won the best color print in show at the Georgia National Fair. In 2018 he won the Sweepstakes Award for that year also from the Georgia National Fair. Ty lives in Macon and is a member of the Georgia Nature Photographers Association and The Ocmulgee Audubon Society.

Things to remember when submitting your entries:

A title is required for each photo. Keep in mind that photos are judged on the image and not on the title. Long titles will not be as easily read when your photo is displayed, as the type will be smaller.

NOTE: "Untitled" is not an acceptable title.

Originality is a plus. You want your photo to stand out among all of the others.

All photos should be clear images and should not be blurry or pixelated.

"Photography is a kind of storytelling without using words and every good photograph should tell a story. What is your photograph trying to say? Is this photograph the very best way to tell your story? You must always try to improve your skills to create your art and be a great storyteller." - Jim Gilreath
